The second card, which followed soon after the first, gave brief instructions to employees when calling outside numbers, as follows: When telephoning anyone, please give the number to the operator, and hold the wire until you get the party called. The operator should not be expected to remember numbers or to look them up. The following general rules, under the heading How We May Plave Good Telephone Service, were printed on the large cards and instructions given to display them prominently on the office bulletin board: 1. By answering the telephone promptly and pleasantly. 2. By speaking directly into the transmitter. 3. By announcing first the bureau, then the person calling. 4. By calling for the number, not the name,...
