Material should not be manufactured at a repair point, that work may be provided for the extra force of mechanics employed to take care of repairs that increase from normal to a maximum state. It is the general practice to partly equip small repair shops with tools and machinery discarded by the general shops as they are considered of value only for small repair jobs that may be required from time to time and not from a strictly manufacturing standpoint. The manufacturing of repair parts for locomotives and cars should be concentrated at the large shops where improved facilities have been provided, the supervision more direct, and the cost reduced accordingly. Concentration of machinery and men should insure reduced cost per unit, and the maintenance of standards so essential to economical operation. It is economy to have on hand at all times a stock of shop manufactured material greater than immediate requirements, but there is a danger limit and this limit will be passed by a maximum force when business is only normal on the road. It is always desirable to employ good mechanics and retain them in the service; by the word good I not only mean skillful, but men who are of value to the community in all ways that imply good citizenship, for as a rule if they are honest, upright, and self-respecting as citizens, the employer obtains this extra benefit. It should be gratifying...
