But he gave us SOME, and if hes dead, of course, that other letterll be opened in two years; and I dont see why he wouldnt give us the rest, as long as hed shown he remembered hed got us. Do you Well-er-as to that- Mr. Smith hesitated. He had grown strangely red. Well, there arent any other relations so near, anyway, so I cant help thinking about it, and wondering, she interposed. And twould be MILLIONS, not just one million. Hes worth ten or twenty, they say. But, then, we shall know in time. Oh, yes, youll know-in time, agreed Mr. Smith with a smile, turning away as another guest came up to his hostess. Mr. Smiths smile had been rather forced, and his face was still somewhat red as he picked his way through the crowded rooms to the place where he could see Frank Blaisdell standing alone, surveying the scene, his hands in his pockets. Well, Mr. Smith, this is some show, aint it greeted the grocer, as Mr. Smith approached. It certainly is. Gee! I should say so-though I cant say Im stuck on the brand, myself. But, as for this money business, do you know Im as bad as Flo. I cant sense it yet-that its true. Gosh! Look at Hattie, now. Aint she swingin the style to-night She certainly is looking handsome and very happy. Well, she ought to. I believe in lookin happy. I believe in takin some comfort as you go along-not that Ive taken much, in times past. But Im goin to now. Good! Im glad to hear it. Well, I AM. Why, man, Im just...
