Excerpt: . chapter V. from the death of cardinal beaton to the suppression of the catholic religion. (1546-1560.) The sudden death of the Cardinal Archbishop of state of St Andrews was fraught, it need hardly be said, the death J of Cardinal with the most momentous consequences both for Beaton. Church and State in Scotland. The Regent lost in him, as he wrote to the Pope, his most trusted counsellor, while the Catholic party, who had justly regarded him as their principal champion, were struck with the utmost consternation. The hopes of that faction, on the other hand, who aimed, with the assistance of Henry viii., at the total abolition of the old religion, were proportionately raised by the removal of their most powerful opponent. The complicity of the English monarch in the assassination of the Cardinal, already sufficiently clear, is further evidenced by his correspondence...
