Exclamo finale fictor adest male fictus-f adulter Verus eram coniunx: me perfida teste teneris. So M: a fact which I would specially signalize, as it proves beyond a doubt that M is not an invariably safe guide. Ovid is telling how Cephalus, distrusting his wife Procris fidelity, absented himself from his home, then returning in a disguise solicited her for a long time in vain. Still incredulous he offers larger and larger presents, till at last she is on the point of yielding. Then Cephalus throwing off his disguise proclaims himself her husband, not her paramour. Ms promitto is of course wrong; we need not doubt the reading of most Mss pro node. Whether loquendo is right is less clear; locando which Heinsius found in one MS is perhaps possible in the sense of stipulating. But the words introduced by...
